

Stanstead Abbots is a village in the Lea Valley just over 2 miles downstream from Ware, at the junction of the B180 and B181. This walk explores the higher land to the north of the village and also drops down into the valley of the river Ash, a tributary of the Lea. For much of the walk there are far-reaching views in all directions.

This is a circular walk of just over 5½ miles. For those not wanting to walk this far, a shorter return route is available.

Park in the free car park to the north of the High Street in Stanstead Abbots, at approximately the point marked B on the map. St Margarets station, on the railway line to and from Hertford East, is a short distance from the start of this walk.

Leave the car park and turn left onto the High Street. If you arrive by train, turn left out of the station onto Station Road and follow the road across the bridge over the river Lea to reach the High Street. Walk towards the far end of the High Street, admiring the Georgian and older buildings here. Just past the Red Lion pub turn left onto Cappell Lane. Cross the road by the building with the clock tower: this is the Old Clock School, dating from around 1636, now a private house (see photo right).

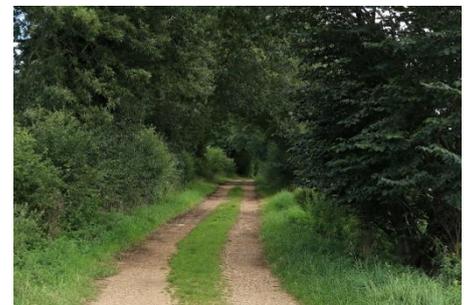

Walk along Cappell Lane (there is a pavement), passing St Andrew's Church which dates from 1880 and was built close to the centre of the village when the original medieval parish church of St James, located 1 mile from the village, was thought to be too far away. Where the pavement immediately alongside the road ends (about 700 yards from the junction with the High Street) turn right onto a public bridleway signposted 'Wareside 2'. This is also the route of the Hertfordshire Way.

The path goes gently uphill. After a short distance keep going straight ahead into the edge of some woodland with a hedge on the left. Further on beyond the woodland there is a deep ditch on the right. Keep climbing steadily, keeping straight ahead as the path levels out.

The route continues to climb very slightly on a wide grassy track between arable fields (see photo right). When you reach a crossroads of bridleways (where the Hertfordshire Way goes straight on), turn left onto public bridleway 18 marked 'Holly Cross Road $\frac{3}{4}$ '. From here there are views to the left across to the wooded slopes of the far side of the Lea Valley and towards London.

Cross the river by the footbridge, then almost immediately turn right: this is the trackbed of the former branch railway line to Buntingford, which opened in 1863 and closed to passengers in 1964 (see photo right).

At the far corner of the wood you have a choice. If you prefer a shorter route (of 4½ miles) keep going straight ahead on the Herts Way clockwise direction which brings you directly back to Stanstead Abbots: after a mile you will rejoin the path you took uphill out of the village.

To keep on the longer route described here, turn left to keep the wood on your left. You are now on the Harcamlow Way, a figure-of-eight route linking Cambridge and Harlow, covering 141 miles and originally devised in the 1970s.

The next mile of the route runs to the right of the hedge, crossing the brow of the hill which at its highest point is just under 250 feet (76 metres) above sea level (see photo right). There are views across arable land, woods and hedges. Later the path runs alongside another wood where it takes a sudden left and right turn.

Continue downhill, perhaps pausing to enjoy the view of London's tall buildings which are 20 miles away (see photo right). Immediately ahead are the buildings in Stanstead Abbots occupied by Hertfordshire's last surviving maltsters, French and Jupps.
